

the Journal of the American Medical Association (JAMA) in 1972, and the Journal of the American Psychiatric Association (JAP) in 1973.

These journals were the first to publish articles on the use of the term "borderline personality organization" (BPO) and "borderline personality disorder" (BPD).

The term "borderline personality organization" was first used by Otto Kernberg in his 1975 book, Borderline Conditions and Pathologies of the Self.

Kernberg's work was based on the idea that BPO is a state of mind that is characterized by a lack of a stable, integrated self.

He argued that BPO is a state of mind that is characterized by a lack of a stable, integrated self.

He argued that BPO is a state of mind that is characterized by a lack of a stable, integrated self.

He argued that BPO is a state of mind that is characterized by a lack of a stable, integrated self.

He argued that BPO is a state of mind that is characterized by a lack of a stable, integrated self.

He argued that BPO is a state of mind that is characterized by a lack of a stable, integrated self.

He argued that BPO is a state of mind that is characterized by a lack of a stable, integrated self.

He argued that BPO is a state of mind that is characterized by a lack of a stable, integrated self.

He argued that BPO is a state of mind that is characterized by a lack of a stable, integrated self.

He argued that BPO is a state of mind that is characterized by a lack of a stable, integrated self.

He argued that BPO is a state of mind that is characterized by a lack of a stable, integrated self.

He argued that BPO is a state of mind that is characterized by a lack of a stable, integrated self.

He argued that BPO is a state of mind that is characterized by a lack of a stable, integrated self.

He argued that BPO is a state of mind that is characterized by a lack of a stable, integrated self.